Groups Urge Strong Opposition to HR 3193, CFPB Rollback Package Under Consideration on House Floor This Week

Dear Representative,

On behalf of Americans for Financial Reform and other undersigned organizations, we urge you to oppose HR 3193, the so-called “Consumer Financial Protection and Soundness Improvement Act of 2013,” which is a Rules Committee rollup of a package of bills designed to gut the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. The bill is scheduled for a floor vote as early as today. We urge you to oppose this legislation.

The CFPB was established as a centerpiece of the Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act in 2010 and took over as the nation’s lead consumer financial regulator on 21 July 2011. Any remaining uncertainty over its authority to protect consumers in both the bank and non-bank financial marketplaces was erased upon the Senate confirmation of its director, Richard Cordray, on 16 July 2013 by a vote of 66-34.

Since July 2011, the CFPB has been doing its job of protecting consumers and establishing rules and guidelines so that markets will work in an open, transparent and fair way. It is putting money back in the pockets of defrauded consumers, including, for example, refunds of over $700 million to consumers from credit card companies that had treated them unfairly, along with refunds of hundreds of millions more from abusive practices ranging from unfair mortgage servicing to auto loan pricing discrimination to deceptive practices aimed at service members.

The CFPB has been on the job helping service members and veterans, seniors, students and other consumers at high risk of financial fraud. Important new rules it has put in place include new standards so that abusive mortgages like those that helped cause the financial crisis cannot return and new protections to prevent people from being gouged when they send money to family abroad. Further, the CFPB is the only federal financial regulator that has met all of its regulatory deadlines, and it has received praise even from industry leaders for its transparency and openness.

HR 3193 includes several bills previously passed in the Financial Services Committee. If the bill were to become law, it would seriously undermine the CFPB's ability to protect the public in a range of ways. We urge you to oppose HR 3193 and any similar proposals designed to hobble the CFPB and prevent it from doing its job.

Here is a summary of the Rules Committee package now known as HR 3193:

- The bill includes the original H.R. 3193 (Duffy), which would weaken the CFPB's independence by strengthening the Financial Stability Oversight Council's already-unique authority to overturn CFPB rules. The CFPB is already the only agency whose rules can be overturned by other regulators.
- HR 3193 now also includes HR 2385 (Duffy), the so-called CFPB Pay Fairness Act, which would reduce CFPB pay schedules and thereby make the CFPB the only federal financial regulator where salaries are not based on the Federal Reserve Board's salary schedules. This will have the effect of making it harder for the CFPB to attract and keep qualified employees, and would also send the message that consumer protection is a lower priority than other bank regulatory functions. Congress recognized the necessity of allowing the CFPB – just like the other financial regulators - to hire above General Schedule salary levels in order to compete for employees with banking sector experience, and it is important that the agency maintain this ability.
- HR 3193 now also includes HR 2446 (Bachus), the so-called Responsible Consumer Financial Protection Regulations Act, which would revisit the issue of a director vs. a commission structure for the CFPB; that is a question that has already been asked and answered. Congress determined that a single director structure, identical to that used by both the regional Federal Reserve banks and the larger and more powerful national bank regulator, the OCC (the OCC can actually shut down financial institutions), was proper for the CFPB. Furthermore, while there are financial regulators that are led by five-member boards, there is no evidence that this structure is more effective. In fact, five-member boards can tend towards more gridlock, even with the presence of a strong chairman. Revisiting this issue is a recipe for disaster—delaying rule-making and enforcement actions in progress and threatening both the certainty and continuity that makes sense for the regulated industry – as well as for consumers. Having a strong director at the helm of the agency is vital in ensuring that the CFPB can effectively implement critical reforms to protect consumers, lower the risks of a repeat financial and housing crisis and level the playing field between banks and non-banks. Further, by requiring that at least one commissioner be the Vice Chairman for Supervision of the Federal Reserve, the bill makes it extremely likely that at least 3, or a majority, of the Commission would be bank and financial industry friendly, rather than focused on policing the markets for consumers.

- HR 3193 now also includes H.R. 3519 (Neugebauer), the so-called Bureau of Consumer Financial Protection Accountability and Transparency Act of 2013, which would undo the CFPB's independence from the often-politicized Congressional appropriations process. Again, this provision radically singles CFPB out from protections against political interference that are currently granted to the Federal Reserve, the OCC and the FDIC. Subjecting the CFPB to the appropriations process would give Wall Street and the worst elements of the financial services industry endless lobbying opportunities to deny the CFPB the funding to do its job if and when the regulator took action the industry did not like.
- HR 3193 also now includes H.R. 2571 (Duffy), the so-called Consumer Right to Financial Privacy Act, which is redundant since it would require the CFPB to protect consumer privacy, something it already does when consumers submit personally identifiable information (PII) to it, under existing privacy protection requirements of Section 1022 of the Dodd-Frank Act of 2010, and something it already does when it studies datasets that do not include PII. As the Director and his colleagues have repeatedly testified, the CFPB does not collect information to study consumers; rather, it collects data—as other regulators do – in order to study markets. Indeed, a number of privacy organizations have previously indicated that they have no concerns with the CFPB's collection and use of data. The bulk of the CFPB's data collection is of de-identified datasets from industry vendors. The CFPB cannot identify individual consumers from these data because the personally identifiable information (PII) has already been stripped.
- The inclusion of HR 2571's further amendment to the 1978 Right to Financial Privacy Act (eliminating 12 USC Section 3413(r) of RFPA) would illogically limit the CFPB's supervisory access in a way that is different than that of all the other prudential regulators, including the OCC, Federal Reserve, Federal Reserve Banks and the FDIC, among numerous other exceptions provided by Section 3413 (exceptions (a)-(q) would be retained, only (r), affecting the CFPB, would be removed). The agency's data resources help it to fulfill its mandate to examine financial products and act as an advocate for consumers. This is important in allowing the agency to counteract the information edge enjoyed by large banks, which are too often able to offer consumers products that add nothing of value but whose fees add considerably to bank profitability.

Thank you for your consideration of our views. If accepted, the proposed legislation would weaken the Consumer Bureau, prevent it from doing its job and instead serve the interests of Wall Street. We urge you to oppose this and any similar bills designed to handcuff the CFPB at the expense of consumers. The CFPB is the first federal agency with only one job — protecting consumers in the financial marketplace. The agency is doing that job well, and there is much work that remains to be done. The bills incorporated into HR 3193 would take away the tools it needs to do its job and undermine its mission. Passage of HR 3193 would harm consumers and empower the worst elements of the financial industry.

Sincerely,
