RE: Confirmation of Richard Cordray to full term as director of the
CFPB

Dear Senator,

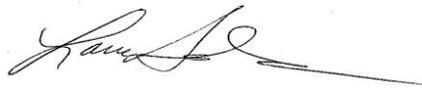

On behalf of our low income clients, we are writing to urge you to permit an up or down vote on the nomination of Richard Cordray to a full term as director of the Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and to base your own vote on Mr. Cordray's qualifications and not on the ideological battle that was resolved in 2010 over the creation of the CFPB.

Our office does not generally take positions on particular nominees. But we note that Mr. Cordray has received praise from across the political spectrum, from Republicans and Democrats, from the banking industry, consumer advocates and many others for his stewardship of the CFPB. He deserves a vote on his own merits.

With uncertainty swirling about the impact of the recess appointment, only those who are unconcerned about protecting consumers should want to see the agency rendered powerless. From supervising banks with over $10 billion in assets, to shedding new light on the practices of credit reporting agencies, payday lenders and debt collectors, to writing rules to implement federal consumer protection laws, to pursuing those who would violate the law, the CFPB has an important job to do. Its authority must be unquestioned.

The fears of those who questioned creation of the CFPB have not been borne out in practice, and holding up confirmation of a permanent director to such an important agency is inappropriate. We urge you and the Senate as a whole to have a straightforward vote on Mr. Cordray's qualifications to serve as the CFPB's Director.

Yours very truly,

Lauren Saunders
Managing Attorney
