Dear Representative,

On behalf of Americans for Financial Reform, we are writing to express our opposition to HR 1341, the “Financial Competitive Act of 2013”.¹ This legislation mandates a study by the Financial Stability Oversight Council (FSOC) of the possible negative effects of the derivatives credit valuation adjustment (CVA) capital charge proposed by regulators. The legislation requires that the FSOC examine potential negative effects on U.S. banks and derivatives markets of differences in the implementation of the CVA charge between U.S. and foreign banking regulators, and submit recommendations for lessening these effects.

The study proposed in HR 1341 is strikingly one-sided. It looks only at the costs to a sector of the financial industry of heightened regulatory standards, and ignores benefits to the public. As proposed, the study would focus only on the potential negative impacts on Wall Street of holding additional private capital to back up their derivatives business. Nowhere in the bill is the FSOC asked to examine the positive effects of additional bank capital in protecting the U.S. economy from financial instability or taxpayers from the pressure to bail out Wall Street derivatives exposures. For this reason, AFR opposes the legislation.

Undercapitalized derivatives exposures were one of the major drivers of the 2008 financial crisis. Wall Street derivatives dealers held far less capital against complex derivatives exposures than a community bank would be required to hold against an ordinary business loan with similar credit exposure. The ability to hold less capital against derivatives exposures helped spur the growth of the derivatives market prior to the crisis. When the financial collapse occurred in late 2008, banks were not holding sufficient capital to survive market stress, and this was a major contributor to the demand for taxpayer bailouts.

The CVA capital charge proposed in Basel III is one of the main responses to this problem of undercapitalized derivatives exposures. The CVA charge is meant to reflect the possibility of default or bankruptcy by derivatives counterparties, and make the bank hold capital to absorb any losses that might result. Such a counterparty failure is exactly what occurred in the case of AIG in 2008.

¹ Americans for Financial Reform is an unprecedented coalition of more than 250 national, state and local groups who have come together to reform the financial industry. Members of our coalition include consumer, civil rights, investor, retiree, community, labor, faith based and business groups.

The European Union apparently intends to exempt a significant number of derivatives transactions from the additional capital requirements under the CVA charge. To the degree that the EU does decide to be more lenient in their implementation of the CVA charge than U.S. regulators are, their economies and taxpayers could be less protected against the risks of failure and unforeseen losses in derivatives markets. As we learned in 2008, the lack of adequate private capital to back up speculative bets made in derivatives markets can have enormous economic costs. Recent headlines make clear that the European Union is still experiencing the negative effects of undercapitalized banking institutions today.

These potential costs of undercapitalized derivatives markets are nowhere mentioned in HR 1341. Instead, the legislation asks the FSOC only to examine the negative effects of holding additional CVA capital on Wall Street financial institutions and derivatives markets. It also asks the FSOC to examine negative competitive effects of differences between the U.S. and foreign regulators in implementing CVA capital charges without asking for any study regarding the impact of reducing U.S bank capitalization to a lower European Union standard.

If any study of CVA capital charges moves forward, it should be a balanced one that includes consideration of the experience of the 2008 crisis and the reasons why regulators have concluded additional capital charges for derivatives exposures are necessary. HR 1341 is not a balanced study and it should be rejected.

Thank you for your consideration. For more information please contact AFR's Policy Director, Marcus Stanley at marcus@ourfinancialsecurity.org or 202-466-3672.

Sincerely,

Americans for Financial Reform
